

Drowned in a Cellar.
Michael Angelo Beulla, an Italian rick-picker, about 60 years old, was drowned on Saturday night in a cellar in Brooklyn. Beulla and another rick-picker, Louis Frasco, occupied the cellar together. They retired at 10 o'clock on Saturday night. Shortly before midnight Frasco was awakened by rain drops splashing on his face. They were coming in through an open window. He jumped out of bed to close the window and landed in about two feet of water. His shoes were floating around the room, and several chairs were upturned and wedged closely together at the foot of the bed. Frasco tried to arouse Beulla, who was fast asleep. The man opened his eyes, and after glancing around the room, turned over on his side and said:

"Oh, it's not up to the bed yet. I have plenty of time. I'm tired; I want to sleep." Frasco left him and went up stairs and told Tony Barber of Beulla's danger. While they were talking Policeman Conoughton of the Bergen street station came along, and Frasco told him that Beulla refused to get out of bed. Conoughton took a look through one of the basement windows and hurried to the station house for help. Round-man Rogers and Policemen McGowan and Tucker were sent to the rescue. When they arrived there they found Daniel Gill getting ready to enter the house.

Roundman Rogers and Gill stripped, and lowering one of the basement windows from the top, dropped into the room. The water was nearly four and a half feet deep. After running around the room for nearly twenty minutes they found the body of Beulla lying in a corner wedged in tightly between the bed and several chairs. It was sent to the morgue.
